lot of space and are not afraid of getting reprimanded or attacked from a more powerful person that implies that you have the resources to protect yourself having your hands on the table is one thing but having your palms facing down is often seen as an aggressive form of dominance the more forward the palms are placed or the more space that the hands take up the more assertive and dominant that person is trying to be here we see Neil deGrasse Tyson's palms down and his hands are very far forward almost halfway across the table which is so far forward that this is borderline confrontational

The video player shows a comparison of two hand gestures: 'Palms down' and 'Palms up'. The 'Palms down' side features a circular inset image of Neil deGrasse Tyson with his hands flat on a table, palm down. Below this image are the words 'Dominance' (red), 'Authority' (orange), and 'Equality' (green). The text '“Telling” someone something' is in red, followed by '“Offering” someone something' in green. At the bottom, it says 'A boss telling his workers what to do'. The 'Palms up' side shows a man in a suit with his hands open, palm up. Below this image are the words 'Equality' (green) and 'Contextual Submissiveness' (pink). The text '“Offering” someone something' is in green, followed by '“Telling” someone something' in pink. At the bottom, it says 'Conversing with someone you view as equal'. Head cocking is done to portray the capability of violence.

This motion sends the message that they are not actively looking to fight, but are more than capable of protecting themselves if the situation arises.

It is similar to “revving” up an engine before utilizing the vehicle

SITUATION CAN FASTLY TURN AGGRESSIVE AND JOE ROGAN WILL DEFENSIVE MODE OPF THINKING

his communicational and verbal defense have not had to be utilized in such a long time that when he finally does have to use them instead of calmly discussing the issue at hand he has to resort to the most rudimentary tactics of quite literally trying to scare his opponent into submission much like a child would do when Joe Rogan questions him very calmly Tyson resorts to raising his voice and using childish immature responses this time when he hears Joe Rogan's response he raises his voice and says so this again shows that he is not used to people speaking back in questioning his statements although we can't see it fully right now notice how stiff his arms are and his hands are still face down on the table

Unless consistently utilized, our skills will naturally deplete overtime

"The basic concept is simple. The brain changes physically, functionally, and chemically, as you acquire any ability or skill. You know this instinctively."

Something must be changing as your abilities improve, or as new abilities emerge. You are actually remodeling your brain machinery by 'practicing' the skill; those physical changes account for your learning.

Thus, if you don't "Practice" the skill consistently, it will naturally degrade over time

Due to the context, we can now tell that he is not interrupting for the sole purpose of making an "attack" towards Joe Rogan, because he is doing it unconsciously Video player interface includes: 9:04 / 11:10, 27K likes, 27K views, and a search bar.

therefore the conclusion can be drawn that NeildeGrasse Tyson only surrounds himself with sycophants people who suck up to him and let him interrupt them at his peril because he often interrupts without even noticing this means that the people he surrounds himself with must allow him to do it Neil deGrasse Tyson quite literally feels as if he's having a regular conversation and is so used to being the big fish in a small pond that he is not even aware of the internal turmoil that he is causing Joe Rogan

the only reason I'm not confronting you bill is because my phone or whatever I'm doing right now is more important than worrying about that statement you just made Joe Rogan is using his phone almost as a failsafe giving him something to do if anyone ever disrespects him or he hears something that he doesn't like he can pretend he is doing something more important some stress people will dart their tongue back and forth from corner to corner of their mouth in nervous or worried anticipation usually they think that they are not being noticed or that the meaning of this behavior cannot be deciphered

Rogan is looking down to the right which signals he is having an internal dialogue with himself

YouTube interface showing a video titled "Conflict Diversion" with a subtitle: "What Joe Rogan does here is center the new topic around himself, instead of external topics. This eliminates risk and gives Joe more control."
